Sanitary.

Huxley, in speaking of the plague in London, in 1664, and the fire which followed says, "It would, I fancy, have fared but ill with anyone who should have broached to our ancestors the doctrine now propounded to you, that all their hypotheses were alike wrong, that the plague was no more in their sense, divine judgment, than the fire was the work of any political, or religious sect, but that they themselves were the authors of both plague and fire, and that they must look to themselves to prevent the recurrence of calamities, to all appearance so peculiarly beyond the reach of human control."

We have no reason to believe that it is the improvement of our faith, or our morals, which keeps the plague from our city. We have learned that pestilences will only take up their abode amongst those who invite them, by having prepared ill drained, ill ventilated, unswept, and ungarnished residences for them, streets, alleys, back slums, teeming with foul accumulations of garbage.

We, in later times have learned somewhat of nature, and partly obey her.

Because of this partial improvement of our natural knowledge, and of that fractional obedience, we have no plague amongst us now.

But, how long is this immunity to last? Is the sanitary state of Honolulu of 1882 any better than the London of 1664?

The "stinging tree" of Queensland is a luxurious shrub, pleasing to the eye but dangerous to the touch. It grows from two or three inches to ten or fifteen feet in height, and emits a disagreeable odor. Says a traveler: "Sometimes while shooting turkeys in the scrubs, I have entirely forgotten the stinging tree till I was warned of its close proximity by its smell, and have often found myself in a little forest of them. I was only once stung, and that very lightly. Its effects are curious; it leaves no mark, but the pain is maddening, and for months afterwards the part when touched is tender in rainy weather, or when it gets wet in washing. I have seen a man, who treat ordinary pain lightly, roll on the ground in agony after being stung, and I have known a horse so completely mad after getting into a grove of the trees that he rushed open-mouthed at anyone who approached him, and had to be shot. Dogs, when stung, will rush about whining piteously, biting pieces from the affected part."
